Researchers and educators have long used color-diffusing paper or film for projecting images on colored backgrounds. Most of these available products use conventional projection technology and are limited to diffusing the light entering the device. There remains a need for a high quality projection device that projects onto a colored background, and by projecting with colors which fade into each other, the projection provides an overall image that looks like the real world scene from which it originated. The device should be of a design that is simple and easily operable, and it should be usable with a variety of light sources, such as the light from a flashbulb, a laptop, a ceiling mounted lamp, etc. Additionally, it should have the ability to significantly increase the size of the projected image by using conventional viewing technology and further, the device should be relatively easy to customize for individual use, either at home or on the go. Previous attempts to achieve the image projection device have had varying degrees of success. U.S. Pat. No. 5,656,976, to Rubinstein, et al., issued on Aug. 12, 1997, which is incorporated herein by reference, describes a compact transmissive projection system using a reflective optics device. The device uses a modified light valve to modulate the light entering the device. U.S. Pat. No. 5,583,628, to Ritter, et al., issued Dec. 10, 1996, and incorporated herein by reference, describes a spatial light modulator including a plurality of areas which each comprise a cell array of liquid crystal switches and a reflective device that are spatially aligned to provide a substantially 100 percent light modulating efficiency of the device. A similar device is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,659,392, issued on Aug. 19, 1997 to Filinovich, which is also incorporated herein by reference. The device produces full color, high resolution images, but requires a complex switching architecture. U.S. Pat. No. 5,621,456, to Olson, issued Apr. 15, 1997, which is incorporated herein by reference, describes a bright, solid state digital image projection system for projecting color images. The image is produced by a light valve comprising a light transmissive body with a plurality of individually addressable liquid crystal light modulator elements each of which includes a liquid crystal layer having a thickness of less than about one micron and a series of apertures that form a periodic array. U.S. Pat. No. 5
