

The motion data was captured with a new motion capture camera system. The camera consists of five cameras which are fitted to players' helmets and vest and captures their full body movements from multiple angles. Once captured, the footage of every player can be analysed during gameplay.

The player's "in-game behaviour" can be affected directly via commands at the player's disposal, through quick decisions during gameplay and via customization of the engine's behaviour models.

New in-game animations are also integrated into the engine and can affect the player's physical appearance, including "hair-lifting." The same is true for skin-tightening. The movement of the facial muscles can also be affected, which will affect the animation of the player. Each player can be customised with several customizable attributes, including weight, physiques, hair styles, facial hair styles, fitness, hair-lift intensity, skin-tightness intensity and movement. FIFA 22 introduces a variety of detailed skill animations which are taken from camera data as well as gameplay data. While FIFA 17 had over 500 animations to be completed, FIFA 22 has 2,000. FIFA 22 introduces a variety of new physics systems, including a new digital concussion system. The engine uses "smooth particle dynamics (SPD) to model the complex viscoelastic, compressive and tensile behaviour of the skin," which is said to show a more realistic and organic skin response, and new muscle-bone interaction animations. The physics engine now offers more detailed visual feedback for the player, such as the "tumbling motion of the head, torso and limbs as they collide with the ground." FIFA 22 introduces a variety of new ball physics, which simulates actual and consistent ball behaviour, as well as the ability to produce controllable "spikes." FIFA 22 includes more movement-based camera angles, which offer a more immersive video experience. FIFA 22 introduces more detailed controls for goalkeepers: "The passing actions of a goalkeeper will now be captured more accurately," and goalkeepers' "reaching or diving actions now look more organic." FIFA 22's ball-carrying system shows the most accurate data to date, with the ball's behaviour also being affected by the player's moving body
