This study examined the impact of a work schedule on mood and other aspects of work-life integration. Subjects were 43 female office workers living in Tokyo, Japan, who were divided into three groups according to their work schedule: a daytime group (Day) working between 10:00 and 17:00; a daytime group (Night) working between 17:00 and 23:00; and a nighttime group (Night+) working between 07:00 and 23:00. A non-work schedule was imposed for the Night group so the Night group could serve as a control for Night+. After working, all subjects completed a work-life balance survey, a life events survey, a Beck Depression Inventory and a Profile of Mood States. Although the Night group (which did not have a non-work schedule) showed a higher work-life integration score (as predicted), neither the Day group nor the Night+ group (which had a non-work schedule) showed a higher work-life integration score (which was expected). There was no significant difference between the Night and Night+ groups in the work-life integration score. The Night group showed a lower work-life balance score than the other groups. The high-work-load group (Night+ group) showed more depression than the low-work-load group (Night group). Thus, the work schedule appeared to be an important factor influencing work-life balance., and is much lower than that of Ce₃Bi₄ (E_g = 1.3 eV) [[@B44]]. However, the maximum g^ value is about 2--3. The large g^* is associated with the distinctive local atomic environment, with changes in the element composition and structural symmetry. In general, the $g^*(\text{Bi})$ value decreases with decreasing the crystal symmetries due to increased quadrupole splitting and the coupling of the orbital angular momentum l . The asymmetric breathing mode of the unit cell would be correlated with the $A_2^{\sim 1}$ -type OO and the $C_2^{\sim 2}$ -type LO symmetries. With an increased compressive strain, the $A_2^{\sim 1}$ -type OO and C
