We present a systematic study of laser-plasma interactions in the nanosecond range of pulse duration. The plasma generation process was modeled using a two-dimensional radiation-hydrodynamic code that was calibrated to Monte Carlo simulations. The characteristics of the interaction were examined as a function of the energy content of the pulse. The dependency on the pulse energy was determined for different propagation distances and angle configurations, leading to a minimum pulse energy of 4 mJ required for reproducible results. These results have been used to optimize the experimental parameters for investigating plasma formation with our imaging
