These hard surfaces can be designed to create directional light or simply to reflect light coming from the direction that you want. Any surface may be used which reflects light. Any solid material such as glass, plastics, or metals may be used if they do not melt at the desired temperature. Be careful not to use any materials that might melt or crack if used in the furnace. Now I hope the whole situation will be clear. With these seven methods we can create a visible moving light. But as you can see we are losing some light in the scene if we start using these methods to create static light. So what to do? Well, let's take a look at the next method. It's a way to add light to a scene without it appearing as moving light. For example, if our background was a flame, we could use this method to create a really nice effect. We will create a solid surface which will reflect the light of the flame so that it is a part of the flame. This will appear as one solid flame. But if we try to animate the flame, only the moving light will move. So if we want the two to appear as one, we will have to make the background solid. The source code for the flame texture might look something like this: and we will need to create a surface which has the same x, y, z coordinates for its individual pixels. While doing this, we need to make sure that the individual pixels of the solid surface are not transparent. We need to make sure
